An excerpt from the book: Antisocial Personality Disorder, like most personality disorders, is believed to be the result of a combination of factors. These factors come in two different regards: genetic or biological factors, which include risk factors, such as hereditary factors, chemical or hormonal imbalances, or early brain damage and environmental factors, which include home life, socialization, learning, etc. The more these risk factors are present for a given individual, the greater the chance that he or she will develop Antisocial Personality Disorder. However, this does not mean that all individuals who have some or even all of these risk factors present in them will, in fact, develop Antisocial Personality Disorder. Diagnosis should be carried out by a professional and must be based on behavior, not risk factors.
