

Aztec Birth: the turquoise mockingbird of light (Inklings) (Volume 2)

(from the Afterword by Peter Whigham)
Paul Portugess translations are unusual in that they are a reliving in modern terms of a body of ancient experience. This sounds straightforward enough; but there is a catch: the body of ancient experience can, in human terms, only be guessed at. There are no Aztec poems of which these English poems are the rendering. There is no living record, save in the most attenuated forms, of the rituals and the attitudes which are their subject. Discernment can come only through the most strenuous acts of historical imagination, working two ways: in order to find out what they then must have felt like, try it on oneself now--under similar circumstances. The author and his wife, armed with various Indian manuals of childbirth, went to Tepoztlan, so that their first child, Amin, might be born there. This is not the place for biography, but Paul Portugess efforts at in-feeling at feeling himself into an ambience, ultimately unknowable--can only be regarded with respect. The result is to be seen in the poems, solemn yet celebratory instances of living, translations, in the general sense of all art that brings it off, and in the sense of cultural transference. However, they are also translations in the narrower sense. They draw, often word for word, on Brother Bernardino de Sahaguns records, in Aztec, of ancient Aztec ritual.
