Barking Up The Right Tree!
By Any Other Name
 by Daniel Castle - June 18, 2001

I've discovered that Doctor Heyer assassinated Master Lincoln. Doctor Heyer is also attempting to destroy an entire Devon Pond.

These discoveries were not so much from my research into history and conspiracy theories as the way the results of a short walk amongst the flower pots in the front yard.

For quite some time Heather - and the dogs - have been collecting roses. One of the biggest differences between San Diego and Oregon is that plants grow here. In San Diego plants would grow, but only if you fooled them into thinking they were somewhere else. The smart plants - those that could tell that the soil had been shipped eight hundred miles and that the water they were receiving hadn't seen a rain cloud for years - would die as soon as they figured out where they were. As such, in San Diego we were only able to raise what are scientifically referred to as Vigenia foliosa - or Shrub Plants.

In Oregon everything grows. Certainly the Shrub

Plants we had brought with us from San Diego grew, but even Smart Plants grew here. Heather reacted to this fact by going crazy with plantings.

We went out and bought all sorts of plants and seeds and pots and wood (to build garden areas) and dirt (to fill garden areas and pots). We planted many things, from vegetables to flowers, with preference given to two kinds of plants.

Roses and Tomatoes.
 In San Diego both tomatoes and roses fell into the classification of Smart Plants, meaning ones we couldn't grow. Since we hoped we could grow these in Oregon, we planted some.

But we made a calculation error. Since in San Diego, even when planting Shrub Plants, it was very likely most of what you planted would die, we had a habit of planting about five times more "stubs"

Arguably one of the worlds first blogs, Barking Up The Right Tree! is both a collection of funny stories and an exploration into the use of the Internet for print publication. Delivered via Hewlett-Packards innovative (and short-lived) HP Instant-Delivery service, these tales of city dwellers relocated to the Oregon forest generate smiles and laughter through both text and imagery. This is one 3-page installment of the Barking Up The Right Tree! column.
